The ideas of popular sovereignty, personal liberty, and equality before the law were familiar to Frenchmen and had been transmitted to various quarters of Europe before the meeting of the States General in 1789. In England they had been practically in effect for a century, but the forms of monarchy surviving there had obscured the fact to all save a few critical observers. The speculative minds of the eighteenth century had been busy with these ideas for nearly fifty years, and among a certain intelligent class they had received a wide circulation and a considerable acceptance before the period when our study begins. This fact explains whatever success the French had in disseminating their political faith. It explains the appearance in each of the neighboring states, at the outbreak of the Revolution, of a...
