Excerpt: . . . the sport of kings, or that they follow the dictates of a base passion The Guest of a Day By Isabel Clarice Illurtraud by J. H. GARDN ER-SOPER JHINGS are always happening to me, he said ruefully. I am afraid you! are that sort of perlson, said his aunt, I but--even here Even here, he assented somewhat apologetically. She was his junior by nearly a year, but by reason of their relationship she was inclined to adopt an air of authority toward him. Yet it seems far away enough, she said, looking across the beautiful Val dArno to where the City of Flowers lay shrouded in a delicate silver mist that revealed rather than concealed the loveliness of her cupola and towers. For some people, said Nicholas lazily, but I believe if I were stranded on the desert island of fiction, I should hear the swish of the inevitable petticoat! He lit another cigarette. They were out in the loggia, and he sat leaning h;s elbows on a little wicker table on which a tray with coffee and cigarettes had just been placed. Im sure youre dying to hear all about it, he said. Of course I am, she said, but you tell things so badly, in such a scrappy manner. I want a clear, consecutive narrative. Oh, its consecutive enough, he said. He became suddenly interested in the landscape--the wonderful wide plain of softest green, the twisted silver ribbon of a river, the...
