Not illustrated. 1877 Excerpt: .When she spent her evenings at home, some of her own family generally spent them with her, and M. Villefort or Edmondstone read aloud or talked. In fact, Edmondstone came oftener than ever. His anxiety and unhappiness grew upon him and made him moody, irritable, and morbid. One night, when M. Villefort had left them alone together for a short time, he sprang from his chair and came to her couch, shaken with suppressed emotion. That man is killing you! he exclaimed. You are dying by inches! I cannot bear it! It is not he who is killing me, she answered; and then M. Villefort returned to the room with the book he had been in search of. In this case Edmondstone s passion took new phases. He wrote no sonnets, painted no pictures. He neglected his work, and spent his idle hours in rambling here and there in a gloomy, unsociable fashion. He looks, said M. Eeuard, as if his soul had been playing him some evil trick. He had at first complained that Bertha had taken a capricious fancy to Madame de Castro, but in course of time he found his way to the old woman s salon too, though it must be confessed that madame herself never showed him any great favour. But this he did not care for. He only cared to sit in the same room with Bertha, and watch her every movement with a miserable tenderness. One night, after regarding...
